A free country must expect that its institutions and its laws will be not only discussed but often vituperated. The extent of such discussions and vituperation will, in general, be proportionate to the true liberty which the country enjoys. In turbulent times beneficial laws and institutions may be overborne and destroyed, but in the main, the goodness of laws and institutions is tested by the fact of their bearing discussion and surviving vituperation. There is a class of politicians and writers of the present day to whom the landowner is the bete noire, and the land laws altogether naught. Sometimes it is the bad laws which have made the landowners bad, sometimes it is the landowners who have made or maintained the bad laws - and sometimes these are made to mutually react on each other till both have attained the very acme of wickedness, and are rapidly hurrying the country into the abyss of ruin, if it be not already there.
